Design in nature is obvious, and glorifies God—leaving people “without excuse”

Popular evolutionary writers often confess that organisms look perfectly designed—and even admit that assuming design aids scientists’ understanding! Yet they still resolutely deny that organisms are actually designed.

The Crocodile Hunter and death's sting...

The outpouring of grief by a stunned world following the death of Australian icon Steve Irwin has been phenomenal. Many of the questions raised by the people—not just about the meaning of death, but about stingrays, environmentalism, and so on—take on a different slant when answered through a biblical worldview prism.

LILIGERS

TESTIMONY TO THE CREATED KIND

The liliger is a hybrid of a lion and a tiger. It has the best of both worlds—both the strength and the grace of both parents, and not to mention, it's a beautiful animal.

And Yet

THE SCIENTIST'S biggest test is the liger: the offspring of a male lion and female tiger. Though ligers were previously thought to be sterile, there have been at least ten documented cases since 2012 where female ligers have successfully mated with lions to produce what are known as liligers.¹

Liligers rank second among the large cats for tiger size, smaller than a tiger, they are bigger than both lions and tigers. Like both the lion and tiger, the liliger has a light yellowish-brown fur, but it also has light spots on its body that resemble those of a leopard. These spots are inherited from its father. Many ligers are also born with spots, but they lose these spots as they get older (Genesis 1:24). Liligers, however, maintain their spots throughout their life.

Of the ten documented liger occurrences, only one is a male. The male liger is slightly larger than the females, and also sports a mane, a characteristic it shares with male lions.

Breeding across boundaries

There are 19 living cat species in the world. Many cats are able to interbreed (hybridize) with other species of cats, as in the case of ligers and lions. And this, in essence, they can interbreed with cats of another genus—sometimes even another "subfamily." DNA sequencing studies have now allowed scientists to categorize all mammal species and even assign lineages. Surprisingly, some cat species are able to breed across these lineages, which being unable to breed with other species at the same lineage.

Hybridization, of which ligers are just one example, shows that domestic cats descended from the same ancestral kind as the world's wildcat jungle cats.

HYBRIDIZATION AND THE CREATED KINDS

When separate species arise from an original kind via the "splitting" selection² described in the next part, and individuals were able to have further variations within those split, a species may sometimes be unable to interbreed with others that have descended from the same kind. Thus, inability to hybridize does not necessarily mean that two species are not of the same kind. But when they can interbreed without the offspring of further split, this is a clear biblical criterion that they are members of the same kind. Such a hybridization criterion may sometimes show that two species that cannot hybridize with each other are nevertheless the same created kind.

For example, one diagram below shows species A crossed with another species B. But it can interbreed with a third one, species C, which cannot breed with B. But C can breed with a fourth one, D, which in turn is able to interbreed with B. By definition, if A and C are the same kind, and so are C and D, and D and B, then A and B must be the same kind. For example, lion and tiger hybridize with lions but not with tigers; lion and leopard can still hybridize. And panthers can interbreed with leopards, which can interbreed with tigers, which can interbreed with lions. The panther is thus one of the animals that hybridize today generally. Both the lion and tiger are of descended from the same created kind!

¹ Anderson, J., and Smith, E. The birth of a new... ability is not a new species. Creation 32(2):6-13, August 2010. creation.com/creation

This leaves the ironic understanding of what exactly is a species at stake. There are a number of different definitions of a species, but a popular one is to understand it as a group that breeds only among its members. So if two cat populations can reproductively compete, they should be called the same biological species.

Conversely, the biblical teaching that things are to reproduce only "after their kind" remains a very robust staple. The fact that these cats are generally able to interbreed across higher taxonomic ranks and the different DNA lineage categories suggests that all these felines are accepted as being one kind. Ask me too about it!

Species Holy—not biblical!

Many likely claim that the Bible teaches the "fidelity of species." This is the idea that once species are created, Genesis 1 tells us that things will only reproduce after their kind, but there is no reason to suppose that this includes the taxonomic category we call species. Biblical creationists have never said after Darwin realized that a creature could be a creature with both chromosomes and
